Check out the map below for a visual of what we're talking about: The NFL makes $8 billion a year, according to a study from MIT. Yet, they haven't discovered the dark side of the force yet. Jeff Flake is only the second lawmaker in the history of the United States to have his base intentionally go AWOL to protest him. #TheBestOne. A high-stakes test of the intrinsic value of books The Roman Empire was a melting pot of cultures and ideas and it was, in many ways, the most influential civilization of its time. The powerful, the influential, the educated, the creative and the business-minded traveled from all corners of the empire to its capital city, Rome. There they met to debate, entertain, scheme and see how their own ideas compared to the great thinkers, philosophers, politicians and artists from other parts of the empire. Why did it make sense for anyone to travel to the hub of the empire to see what the people of Rome had to say? In the past, experts thought that travel and education were luxuries enjoyed by the wealthy and the elite. Travelers had to be rich to afford the journey; scholars had to be well-educated to understand what they saw. In fact, for the majority of people, the only way to learn about faraway lands was through the books and narratives that took them there. But today, we have a different conception of what knowledge and education can do. We think that anyone can learn, and if they want, they can take college courses, go to a good book store and read a book about everything from astrophysics to gardening. Books, of course, offer more than information. They are objects that are not only valuable for our health and understanding, but valuable for their own sake, as well. And they have a special place in our lives because they are one of the few things that don't spoil.
